Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism - Making a Female ...

Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism provides an interdisciplinary, theoretically engaged answer to an enduring question for charismatic Christianities: how do women lead churches? By examining the ministries of two famous (and infamous) Pentecostal revivalists, Maria Woodworth-Etter and Aimee Semple McPherson, this study shows that a woman's success in the ministry was not simply about access to ordination.

Abstract. The remarks of three reviewers concerning Leah Payne's award-winning book, Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism: Making a Female Ministry, were initially presented at the annual meeting of the Society for Pentecostal Studies in San Dimas, California in March 2016. The piece concludes with Payne's reply to the reviewers, and a call to continue the important work of studying Pentecostalism through the lens of gender studies.

In the process, the women created biblical theologies that are alive and well in Pentecostal-charismatic circles today. Their negotiations of gender, race, class, and religious leadership continue to inspire generations of imitators, and their stories illuminate how female ministers were made in early twentieth-
